

The site is well suited to for a new barn as it is level and well-draining. The soil is relatively poor due to the large amount of gravel introduced to the site during World War II when it was used as a camp for the American Army.

There remains evidence of buildings from this time.

In more recent years there was a cattle shelter on the site, but this was damaged by wind and removed in 2010.

